will, fully expecting to obtain refugee status. When his application is rejected, the sense of hopelessness and the become dejected and highly symptomatic and unable to cope.

Erosion of Core Assumptions of Existence and the Perpetuation of Shame

Central assumptions about human values and rights continue to be attacked in the host country. For example, inconsistent government policies for the granting of resident status promote a deep sense of injustice. People from one country who are rejected for refugee status while others are accepted as refugees or as residents under alternative categories created on their behalf, and a deep sense of discrimination. Following the Tasmantian Squatting, 11,000 PNG nationals were granted residence status in Australia following a government commitment to do so. At the same time, Cambodians arriving by boat were held in detention. Such government action is augmented by the fact that the host government had been perceived as benevolent, publicly presenting itself as protective of human rights.

The violation of human rights and the injustice of subjecting people to degradation is the mark of the oppressor. Perceived acts of injustice in the host country are not mere triggers for previous trauma but are new stimuli evoking betrayal of human values. They promote distrust and suspicion of the host country.

Rejection of claims for protection is not merely a threat to basic security but, typically, evokes shame and humiliation about not being believed. It can be perceived by the asylum seeker as punishment when going to the host country and leaving others behind is punishment. In the rejection of the client's application for refugee status, the client may experience a sense of being rejected about being rejected. The loss of the client's sense of self-worth and the loss of the client's sense of self-worth, of such an outcome.

The client's sense of self-worth and self-esteem is further eroded by the client's sense of chronic anxiety and depression. The client's sense of self-worth and self-esteem is further eroded by the client's sense of chronic anxiety and depression. The client's sense of self-worth and self-esteem is further eroded by the client's sense of chronic anxiety and depression.
